Bosh Out For The Season

Chris Bosh is a great forward for Heat. But sadly, he won't be able to be with his teammates, as he is in South Florida, resting in a hospital. A blood clot has been found in his lungs.

Chris Bosh was reported by the Heat that he was going to miss at least the remainder of the 2014-15 season. Bosh thanked lots of the fans and supporters for giving their messages, love and support. Heat Head Coach Eric Spoelstra and Heat Guard Dwayne Wade went to visit Bosh in the hospital on Saturday. "It's been very emotional for all of us," Spoelstra said. Bosh will need at least 6 months of limited physical activity. Just on Wednesday, former Portland Trail Blazer Jerome Kersey died of a blood clot in his lungs. This is a very scary and hard treatment to cure. Also, last month Brooklyn Nets Forward Mirza Teletovic was told to sit out for the season, and Cavaliers Center Anderson Varejão had a similar injury in the 2012-13 season. We hope that Bosh can get on the court soon.

In The Rulebook

The MLB has created 3 new rules that they think will make a baseball game much shorter and quicker. The first rule is making the managers stay in the dugout when calling a challenge, instead of waiting on the field for so long. The second rule is that batters must always have at least one foot in the batters box at one time, instead of taking long practice swings. And lastly, there will be a timer. At 40 seconds left in the break, the pitcher has some walk-up music, at 30 seconds, the warm-up pitches are done, at 25 seconds, the music ends, at 20 seconds, the batter gets into the batters box, and from 20-0 seconds, the pitcher is in his motion to deliver a pitch.

UNC Honoring Dean Smith

The North Carolina Tar Heels came back to their home court at the Dean Smith Center. This was the first time that the Tar Heels were at home after the death of the great Dean Smith. In honor of the great UNC coach that lead the Tar Heels to victory, Head Coach Roy Williams held up the number 4, showing that he wanted to run the old Four Corners play, which was run by Dean Smith at North Carolina. Then, all the players, off or on the court, holds up a 4. The play was set up with the point guard bringing the ball up, the guards behind him at half court and the forwards at the corner of the three-point arc. Marcus Paige, the junior Point Guard for UNC, got into a two man trap, but was able to pass out of it to junior Forward Brice Johnson, who got a layup with two men on him. This was also special because it was the first points of the game, making the moment much bigger than if it was in the middle of the game when it wouldn't really matter. It was a great way to start off their first game back at home after Dean Sith had died, and they did a great play for a great person.
