

THE SPORTIER

---

The World Series 2015

---

4 World Series games have been played this year, and it looks like the Kansas City Royals are going to take this series, as they are up 3-1 going into tonight's game in New York vs the New York Mets. Going into this series, the Royals were favored by a lot. They took their games at home, which gave them an early 2-0 series lead. In game 1 of the series, Alcides Escobar had a first pitch inside the park home run, which was booted by Yoenis Cespedes. That was the first inside the park home run in the World Series since 1929. Then the Royals came to New York to play the Mets, and the Mets knocked the ball around, getting 12 hits and scoring 9, and they came away with a victory in game 3, but in game 4, the Mets had a lead thanks to a multi-homer game for the rookie Michael Conforto, but in the top of the 8th, Mets 2nd baseman Daniel Murphy made a costly error with men on first and second, which turned into a 3 run inning for the Royals, and they took game 4. Now, the series is 3-1 Royals, going into game 5 in New York. If the Royals win, then they are the champions, but if the Mets win, they will send this series back to Kansas City.

---

NFL Week 8

---

In football, there has been a lot of things happening. First, the teams that are undefeated are the Patriots at 7-0, the Bengals at 6-0, the Broncos at 6-0, the Packers at 6-0 and the Panthers at 6-0. The Giants have jumped to the top of their division, and, surprisingly, the Redskins are ahead of the Eagles.

On Thursday, the Patriots defeated the Dolphins, 36-7. The rest of the week should have good match ups. One is the AFC North division showdown between the first place and undefeated Bengals and the second place Steelers. The Steelers are 0-1 against their division, while the Bengals are 1-0 against their division. Another good game is the Sunday night game, between the undefeated Packers and the undefeated Broncos. On Monday night, the Colts will go on the road to face the Carolina Panthers.

---

Patriots Again?

---

Last week, when the Patriots faced the Jets, the Patriots were asked to look for something. And when this happens, nothing is ever good. They were asked to look for listening devices in Jets locker room, or the visitors locker room. It started when Jets Security Director Robert Mastroddi made an inquiry with NFL Security regarding the two individuals wearing headsets and Patriots attire, who were positioned outside of the bench area on the Patriots sideline. The NFL employee took pictures of each of the Patriots employees with their identification badges and demanded to check their cell phones and check their headsets to see if they were operating on the right channel. The NFL employee said that they had already checked the visitors locker room for bugs. After the questioning, the NFL employee continued to hover over the Patriots employees until the third quarter, when a stadium operations manager told the NFL employee to route all further inquiries through Patriots and Gillette Stadium management. One of the men in question told the operations men that he was charged with maintaining the referee's microphone during the game. Ultimately, Lenny Bandy- the NFL's Director of Security Services- had to call the league office to satisfy Mastroddi's concerns. Earlier this year, we learned that team employees are responsible for some of the in-game maintenance of communications equipment. We know that because the Steelers stated that the Patriots were messing with their in-game headset frequencies, but the league is in charge of frequencies. After the whole Patriots sideline and their facility was checked, nobody found any bugs. They weren't cheating, but this happens too often to the Patriots.

Source: CSNNE